Perhaps the greatest goal in life is to be able some day to be proud of one's life. The day I will leave this house after a lifetime of world service, I will be proud and I will not hesitate to proclaim my pride. Sometimes I think that I would feel honoured to wash the floor of this house, for on it tread humans from all over the world every day. You see them come a million a year, children and adults of all races, languages and beliefs. They come to this building carrying in their minds their dreams and in their hearts their hopes. They feel that the U.N. is their building, the embodiment of their search for peace and happiness.

It is refreshing to think that on a globe where there is still so much violence, indecency and disfigurement, there are those few islands, the United Nations sites, where one can see cleanliness, decency, no graffiti, no disfiguration, an atmosphere of kindness. This we owe, to a very large degree, to our Security Forces.

Mr. Robert Muller, Deputy Under-Secretary-General for Inter-Agency Affairs,
